UNCLUTTER YOUR BRAIN

Carleen Hicks LoveYourWorkingLife.com

Ever feel like your brain is holding a never-ending to-do list? You're not alone. It takes a lot of energy to keep everything you've committed to queued up in your head – and it's exhausting, especially if you're worried about what you might forget!

I'm sharing something that's been a game-changer for me. Quick and easy worksheets to help reduce your mental load so you can feel confident and energized throughout your day.

Getting out from under overwhelm is a thrive move, one that's vital to succeeding without self-destructing. I use this practice in the morning to keep overwhelm from getting in the way of my success. I know it can help you thrive too.

Carlier

Start by giving yourself a moment to breathe before beginning.

Gently transition into this time.

- Name 1 thing you can taste
- 2 things you can smell
- 3 things you hear
- And 4 things you can see

Step 1 | Brain-dump

Like with any good de-cluttering process, you have to get it all out before you put it back where you can find it.

Take 5 minutes and write down everything that's floating around in your brain. No editing! It can be anything - from your work list to deepest fears and everything in between. It doesn't need to be spelled correctly or in any particular order, just dump it all out here.

Step 2 | Tame the clutter

between being able to put your feet up, or working late (and not just on work stuff, but home stuff too – be bold, put something in here your family can start doing).

It's always a relief to capture "all the things" – phew! Now, take every item on your list and place it in it's box, so you not only know where to find it, but what to do with it. There may be things on your list that don't fit in one of these boxes – hang on, we'll get to those. For now, box up what you can.

What can only be done by you, What needs to be broughtand has to get done today? forward or planned for? These are things that only you can do These are things that don't have to be done today and you want to do them, because you have the knowledge, skills, expertise, etc. and they need to but they need time to ensure they're be accomplished before you're done attended to in a meaningful way. Like for the day. professional development, nonurgent but important tasks and the things that feed your soul (hobbies, THIS IS YOUR SMALLEST LIST exercise, sleep, etc.). Put time for (3-5 items) these items in your calendar now so you can make them happen in the future. What can you give to others? What can you purge? These are things that don't have to be These are things that don't make a meaningful difference and you know done by you, and are not urgent. this because they are not done and Really lean into this box, there is no one has missed them. Like a always something that can go here, lurking item on your "To Do" list and support someone else's growth and development. If it helps, what that's been there for months. If it was you put here makes the difference important you'd have gotten to it, so consider purging it and making room for something else that will make a real difference (like taking a well-deserved break).

4

Step 2 | Tame the clutter continued...

What can only be done by you, and has to get done today?	What needs to be brought- forward and planned for?
What can you give to others?	What can you purge?

Step 3 What's left?

Is there anything from your brain-dump that didn't make it into a box?

When there are, these are items for which there are no clear actions, like worries and thought distortions (i.e., "I think my boss hates me..."). Worries keep you stuck in the problem, feeling like there is no way out. If left unattended, worries can make you more stressed and emotionally reactive.

> A great way to keep worries and thought distortions from boomeranging back is to give your brain a break. The quickest and most effective way to do this is to:

take

deep belly-filling 'acat

breath

Slowly letting it out. Once more. And again. Ahhhhh. This allows the logic side of your brain to over-ride the emotional side, bringing in objectivity that highlights choices and sees solutions, shrinking worry into something you can either purge, or action.

The key is to breathe, because when you're stressed your brain receives less oxygen, making it harder to think clearly. Unclutter Your Brain

© 2024 Carleen Hicks. All Rights Reserved

6

Unclutter Your Brain © 2024 Carleen Hicks. All Rights Reserved

One last thought...

When you operate in survival mode, you use survival language. This adds to your mental load, and can even impact the way others perceive you, especially at work.

Be mindful of how you're referencing yourself and your day: See if moving from survive language to thrive language helps ease off your overwhelm.

I don't know how to do this
I have to	>
I'm not good at this	>
I'm overwhelmed	>
I'm in over my head	>
No one values me	>
I have no time for	>

- I'm not able to do this, yet.
- I can choose to...
- I'm open to learning and improving.
- I need a break before continuing.
- There are people who can help me.
- I can share how I make a difference
- I'll see what's urgent and what can
- wait I don't have to do everything now.

LOVED THIS WORKBOOK? SUBSCRIBE FOR MORE!

- Weekly blog articles (2-3 minute read) to explore what professional prosperity looks like for you
- Exquisite monthly digital workbooks/ journals like this one (exploring a new topic each month), designed to empower success-based habits and mindsets
- Community access to share and support your progress

